If you're a fan of digital photography, this may be a bit of a downer. If, however, you're a fan of low-quality snapshots, you'll probably be okay. Read on for details! Researchers at Harvard University and MIT have detected an unexpected fault in the latest generation of CCD-based digital cameras: The problem seems to occur when a "sensor defect or tampering can cause a light leak when an image is captured and stored," according to a statement released by the University of California at Berkeley. Until now, CCD imaging was considered to be virtually immune to false signals resulting from imperfect sensor elements. On CCD sensors, incoming photons initiate a random-walking charge on tiny silicon and glass 09e8f5149f

I've read this SO question but am not sure if this is the best way to do what I'm trying to. I want to be able to expose a simple wrapper that will take in a function and a key name and return a function that is wrapped with the given key. To illustrate, here's what I want to achieve. func_decorator({function(value) : {return value}}) -> WrappedFunction The results would be something like this: ?function_decorator({function(value) : {return value}})(2) 2 What I would ideally like to do is not use variables. I would love to create a decorator that can do this: ?function_decorator(function:function_name(value) : {return value}) It is the same as the following: ?function_decorator({function(value) : {return value}}) 2 How would you go about doing this? Is it a decorator pattern or is it a function-based decorator?
