Field of the Invention The present invention is generally directed to the construction of optical devices, and more specifically, to a method for forming a micro-cavity, and a method for forming a distributed Bragg reflector. 2. Description of the Prior Art Conventional optical filters are typically coupled to other optical components by using rod lenses. This requires the alignment of the rod lenses to the optical fiber or optical waveguide with submicron accuracy. In addition, the rod lens alignment may be time consuming and may not be able to be repeated over a large area. Furthermore, the use of rod lens in coupling an optical device to a fiber or waveguide also limits the maximum size of the device that can be built. Thus, the limit of optical devices produced with the conventional method is approximately 1 cm. Cavity resonators are used in lasers to increase the efficiency of the laser. These cavity resonators provide an increased population inversion, as well as a longer lifetime for the population inversion. In order to facilitate the increase in the population inversion, the cavity resonator is frequently constructed to have reflectors that reflect back an amplified optical signal. In order to achieve a greater output, a distributed Bragg reflector (DBR) is utilized. It has been found that the reflector cannot be fabricated by etching a smooth surface into a semiconductor wafer. Rather, it is necessary to fabricate a rough surface and polish the surface to a desired smoothness. The highly polished surface is then bonded to a semiconductor wafer that has been etched to form the distributed Bragg reflector. The fabrication of a distributed Bragg reflector is complex and time consuming, and requires expensive and complicated machinery and multiple processing steps. Therefore, there is a need for a method that is simpler, less expensive, and more efficient than the methods of the prior 3da54e8ca3
