Deep vein thrombosis (DVT) is one of the possible complications of stroke. Because of the high incidence of DVT, we have to prevent this complication in stroke patients. The risk of DVT varies in relation to the clinical picture and etiology of the stroke. The following aspects must be considered: risk factors, stroke subtype, stroke severity, stroke recurrence and stroke-related risk factors, and stroke mechanism. We can classify these risk factors into three groups: (1) personal risk factors, (2) stroke-related risk factors and (3) risk factors which apply to the majority of the stroke patients. The personal risk factors are: age, gender and being overweight. Since the 1970s a fairly large amount of evidence has been collected to support the recommendation of prophylactic or preventive treatment of recurrent DVT. Anticoagulant therapy has proved to be the most effective and safest treatment. The best timing for initiating anticoagulant therapy is within 3 months after stroke. The best choice is low molecular weight heparin f30f4ceada
