The founder of Tally Capital, a trading firm for crypto-based financial services, recently shared his views with CryptoSlate about the prospects of the blockchain and stablecoin industry. He specifically referred to the US dollar-backed token, USDT, on which the stablecoin was launched last year by blockchain platform Liquid. "The dollar, up until this point, has been easily accepted and widely used. And USDT is a two-thirds dollar backed by something that has the backing of a government. And on top of that, it doesn't have the liquidity of bitcoin," said Silver to Bloomberg. The comments made by Silver come after Tally Capital, a crypto fund which trades 10% of its portfolio in crypto, started to use the stablecoin. According to the report by Bloomberg, the firm has reportedly been using Tether in its trades and says that it is so far the best performance improvement that they have seen. According to the report, Silver says that Tether cannot be held accountable to the financial market, unlike cryptocurrency, which is highly market dependent. At the same time, he expresses his interest in the establishment of more stablecoins. "When the classic banking system is so old, it doesn't really grasp the internet well.
