So instead of adopting and using and generally supporting the well understood common public standards for all features of all Web browsers, we get pissed off about the things that one tiny minority of software developers with absolutely no stake in such matters as the success or failure of the Free Software movement, or the implementation of the Web, want to foist on us. Yes, my comment was snarky. But you do bring it back around to counterproductive. Thank you. ----- crazypyro I've never really understood why people keep complaining about what is being loaded into their browser when there are already a ton of trojans on the internet. ~~~ lucian1900 Because one of the most popular trojans has been found to put installed USB devices under its own root filesystem. Sure it could've been used to offer some extremely obscure feature, but apparently the most popular trojan we know of is still being actively developed. ~~~ crazypyro If the trojan is on a USB device, why wouldn't you just keep the root filesystem on the USB device rather than keeping it in the browser? ~~~ lucian1900 Why would you? Internet Explorer is widely used for web banking and other sensitive operations. What user wants to replace the bank's usb with their browser-controlled USB? ----- drivebyacct2 If you don't know who the author is, do a quick Google. I found him to be really knowledgeable about the web and this is an important issue. I find it quite curious that if anyone is concerned about
