The Four Core Types of Digital Imaging Technology Figure 5.11 shows some of the core four types of digital imaging technology. Figure 5.11 Basic digital imaging technology is divided into four core types. The four core types of digital imaging technology include the following: 1. Native format and pixel count (also known as bit depth). Images are stored in a digital format, the native format of the camera. Pixel depth, or bit depth, is the number of bits used to describe a single color in a digital format. More bits are used to describe a color with a higher bit depth. 2. Size. The size of a digital photograph is measured in pixels. 3. Noise. This is simply a measure of how well a digital camera, scanner, or other imaging device minimizes the amount of noise introduced during the capture of an image. Noise is a small, unwanted pattern that can occur in an image. Noise results from the thermal and electronic characteristics of image sensors, the processing Risk assessment of Toxocara sp. in muskrats: current status and future directions. Little is known about the relative risk of toxocariasis among wildlife. It is difficult to assess the importance of such exposure to the disease in humans, especially when the data for different species are so dispersed. The threat of a problem of toxocariasis is greatest when wildlife are at the apex of the food chain. In addition, increased contact with a wildlife species should reduce the risk. If the risk associated with toxocariasis in wildlife is high, prevention of further increase of toxocariasis in humans should be an important goal. We have proposed four areas in which risk assessment of toxocariasis in wildlife could be developed. First, knowledge of the relative importance of different species of wildlife in the food chain should be determined. Second, biological and clinical manifestations of toxocariasis in wildlife should be more clearly defined, and the role of the infective stage of Toxocara species in these animals more clearly delineated. This in turn should lead to a better understanding of the risk of toxocariasis in wildlife. Third, there should be more field research on the epidemiology and pathology of the disease in wildlife. Fourth, more laboratory research should be undertaken on the natural history of Toxocara infection in wildlife. This research should include studies of the anatomy and histopathology of the disease in various species of wildlife, in addition to the use of laboratory models to study the development of the adult stage of Toxocara infections in these animals.
