//WELCOME.XP//v2.2.7//pr057dk//h012/index.html As the first public speaker for a big change in this universe, and valedictorian turned vice president of Apple, Tim Cook certainly made an impact during his last commencement address at the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor on Saturday, June 16. Cook, who was chosen to be the next leader of Apple in June 2013, spoke for around 15 minutes and used his experience running Apple to speak to how college students can build a business. “Confused thoughts are common on college campuses. I will try, for a second, to explain my thinking,” said Cook at the start of his speech. “With 70 percent of jobs created in the United States going to college graduates, we need to help all of our talented students find the right fit for them in an increasingly diverse society.” Cook took Harvard Business School grad Jay Rasulo as an example and spoke about the entrepreneur who he hired for Apple’s product design. Rasulo was already at Apple when the company began to grow, but didn’t quite know how to fit in. “In a lot of ways, it’s the same problem you will face as you arrive at any position of leadership,” Cook said in front of thousands of graduates. “Before you get there, you’re not really sure what’s going to be expected of you.” This commencement for two generations is also putting a spotlight on the speech in the Apple family, after it was revealed that Steve Jobs had been recovering for months at the La Jolla, California facility that houses the Apple center. Jobs was found to have a pancreatic neuroendocrine tumor and began his treatment in 2009, but just after he was diagnosed with the tumor, a biopsy of the tumor revealed pancreatic cancer. Jobs died on October 5, 2011. “Today, in the company of friends and former partners, I have had the privilege to say hello and goodbye to Steve,” Cook said.
