In them, a group of people are about to run the New York City Marathon while wearing "prosthetic" limbs. It's kind of like one of those things where you're riding on a bicycle and someone comes up behind you with a steamroller and you see what happens. It's a pretty good premise for an advertisement. Of course, according to the person behind the ads, the "Dash" isn't meant to be "celebrating disability" or to encourage anyone to "relate" to people with disabilities. It's just meant to raise awareness for people with disabilities and their issues. While that's fine, it's not really much of an accomplishment. It's really no different than standing up on the top of a chair to shout "Attention all! I'm special!" It may be a great thing to do to raise awareness about something people can get behind. However, too often advertising with the "awareness" angle gets too pushy, and ends up being offensive. Most people involved in the "Doing the Disability Dash" weren't trying to be, well, offensive. While there's been much debate about the "Dash" and the possible offenses people may take if they attempt the "dash", it's not going to stop anyone from doing it. I have an idea. Why don't we just give them some money to do it? If they really do want to raise awareness about issues with people with disabilities, a donation is a great place to start. However, there's the potential to be offensive again, especially if the people wearing the prosthetics are able-bodied. If any groups are planning on doing the "Dash" in the future, or are even thinking about trying it, I'd like to suggest that they maybe spend the money on getting some public service announcements or maybe even some disability awareness classes. They could use them to raise awareness about the issues with disabilities, without making anyone

I have an Lidar output table that has about 85,000 points (points that make up single, independent islands). When the table is cached, it takes about 4+ minutes to run and it caches EVERY single setting that I have set up in the Lidar Table Properties dialogue box (see screen-shot). For this, I have literally created about 50.TXT files containing 15-20 settings that I have created. It's the same settings, just saved for different outputs and saved under a different file name. Is there any way to prevent this caching? A: It appears that there is a bug when building a table. I had a table that I was finishing building and it kept looping through a save to *.txt file. When I canceled the build it finished creating the table, but ArcMap was still using the previous table. To fix this, I deleted that table and then started a new one.
