Numerical investigation of quantum dots by reflection and transmission electron microscopy. Reflection electron microscopy can be used to determine the concentration and size of In/Ga quantum dots, whereas transmission electron microscopy is required to determine the composition of the dots. In this paper we describe the quantitative analysis of both methods, and demonstrate that the results of the two techniques are in excellent agreement and confirm the use of transmission electron microscopy for compositional investigations. The methods are applied to a random network of quantum dots by considering the response of an ensemble of quantum dots, which is particularly appropriate for In/Ga quantum dots.
