The G-protein-coupled receptors (GPCRs) in the central nervous system (CNS) are mainly expressed in neurons and microglia and play important roles in neuronal functions. Here, we examined the profile of changes in GPCR expression in mice with experimental infection of the CNS by a CNS-compatible herpes simplex virus (HSV-1). In the frontal cortex of SCID mice, expression of a large number of GPCRs was altered after infection with HSV-1. In particular, expression of three members of the GPCR M1 family, GPRM1, GPRM5, and GPRM3, was selectively upregulated after infection with HSV-1. To examine the role of GPCR expression in HSV-1 replication in the brain, the expression of GPRM3 in the brain cortex of mice treated with HSV-1 was suppressed by injection of antisense oligonucleotides. 6d1f23a050
