Electronic devices often include wireless circuitry with antennas. For example, cellular telephones, computers, and other devices often contain antennas for supporting wireless communications. It can be challenging to incorporate wireless circuitry into a package with acceptable reliability. Inexpensive, low-quality manufacturing processes may lead to the kind of defects that can short out the wireless circuitry. If care is not taken, the antenna structures of a device may not be able to maintain sufficient impedance over a broad range of operating frequencies, so that they will not provide satisfactory performance. It would therefore be desirable to be able to provide improved wireless circuitry for electronic devices.Q: Why are there so many more methods for each data structure than I need? For example, a List class has so many methods. A LinkedList has even more. I don't like the idea that I have to know all of this, so why? EDIT: To clarify, I am new to Java and am taking a course on it. I believe the textbook comes with a C++ or Java-like language that uses and (I don't know if this is a made up phrase) returns a "standard library" of various types. I
