I am Pretty sure this will help someone save alot of time.Differentiation of thyroid cancer from adenoma in fine needle aspirates: the role of quantitative cytomorphometry and cytochemical stains. A prospective study was designed to determine the usefulness of cytomorphometry and cytochemistry in the diagnosis of thyroid nodules in fine needle aspiration (FNA). Comparison was made between cytomorphometric parameters and cytochemical results with respect to accuracy of diagnosis of malignancy. Conventional cytomorphologic features, cytomorphometric parameters, and cytochemical stains (acid-fast-bacilli, metachromatic material, periodic acid-Schiff, and mucicarmine) were examined in 434 thyroid aspirates. All the aspirates were classified into 2 groups: benign and malignant. Malignant lesions were further divided into a follicular cell carcinoma group and a papillary carcinoma group. Cytomorphometric parameters of the benign and malignant groups were compared using Student's t test. The diagnostic performance of each cytomorphometric parameter and each cytochemical stain was evaluated by calculating the sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value, and negative predictive value. A receiver operating characteristic curve was used to define the ideal cutoff point for each of the parameter combinations. Cytomorphometric parameters were significantly different for both benign and malignant lesions. Malignant lesions had a significantly higher nuclear/cytoplasmic ratio (p < 0.001).
