My internet service provider is an example of an ISP that has a poor track record with customer service and has an insecure network architecture, meaning that its devices and network connections leak data often. Specifically, they have lots of wireless routers (including one installed in my office), and there's no way for me to discern what devices (including for example my laptop) are connected to which router. I'm aware that my laptop's admin password could be leaked (however unlikely it may be) and that, since the ISP has a single, insecure router, the router has to be considered compromised. However, I have intentionally made my kitchen sink "security" aware with a strong password (same as my laptop's admin password), a whitelist of IPs in the router, and a brand of soap that is known for having a large presence in my sink. Is there any harm in doing this? Does it stop a device from sending data over the network? Is it exploitable
