We conclude that the proportion of effective treatments is identical for all four thirds of the patients, and the expected proportions of effective treatments have been made explicit in the study design so that all statistical analyses could be performed. Where a treatment has been shown to be more effective than another the more effective treatment should always be used for the whole group of patients. And yes, there certainly is a place for educating children about how the world works. But do we have to do that by telling them that people who are always being mean to little babies that haven't even learned to walk are just big mean bullies, and that we should all be kind to children and not do mean things to them? I think, no, its fine for them to know the truth about bullies and to be told that they are not by default weak and helpless, and that it takes a lot of work to succeed in life and that trying to succeed for a lot of people is a lot harder than for very smart, very hard workers, but that you should keep that in mind and understand that some people really are very mean and don't do anything to earn their success, and sometimes that means that they get to succeed and maybe succeed in a really mean way, and hopefully the more and more non-mean people will rise to take their place.
