Norton Internet Security Patch

get ready to do your homework is your system already patched? if not, what is your plan to deal with the norton security patch? have you made a backup of your system, or are you using it as a testing environment? how are you going to make sure that you get the patches? your humble scribe still watching the database of the national vulnerability database is up-to-date as of this writing. i also still am in the process of testing my patches. you can follow my progress at the security awareness blog. how many patches are too many? how many patches are too many? that question has probably been asked a hundred times this week. in my opinion, the number is zero. if youre not having any problems, why should you be concerned about having patches installed on your system? update: yesterday, i reported that the symantec/norton security patches for windows vista caused explorer to crash. in fact, i got no response from the norton team, and i had to ask a forum member to test the patch. as it turns out, the companys activesync connector did not contain this check until mid-may. while this means that users could get the additional permissions without being in the mailbox owners group, the problem was that exchange 2003 sp2, which contained this fix, wasnt released until june 19. the patch was quite successful and had almost no problems, except for this issue. although the company is working on a new version of the connector that should be released soon, it still doesnt seem like a good idea to release a new version of the software, when there are already so many other issues that are just starting to be fixed. 5ec8ef588b
