The new Photoshop is faster than the previous Lightroom and both of their preview modes are really speedily. Lightroom 5 is faster than Photoshop, but as mentioned, with the new interface on both sides, Lightroom now makes some really intelligent decisions. This means it works faster. This does, however, take away the magical right-click and auto-correct workflow that was designed into the original Lightroom. There's nothing inherently wrong with that, but a well laid out interface really benefits from auto-correct because you can see what an adjustment will do. Compression, RAW, and the new, broadbanded.AI files are typical, simple tweaks that give legacy users something to get used to. It mostly seems to be a streamlining of the interface and a tidying up of some of the locations where you can find things. The Google Cloud-based catalog makes everything more accessible. There are new and better ways of organizing the files and new ways to look at things, bringing some needed interactivity to the table. Unfortunately, there's not a lot that's added to the actual editing tools. While the new skills are there, Adobe is really not going to push them very hard. That's not just a disappointing blow on Lightroom's part, but also an indication of exactly how much has changed in the last three years. Photoshop's marketing department is still pushing the idea that it's a simple and straightforward tool: "Maybe a photo editor?", "Nope. Photoshop." if there were any more signs about the way things will be, that's it. Actually, there are: the new masking options and the new radial filters – both awesome additions to the photo editing experience. With the new masking options, users will have the ability to brush and fill a selection based on a structural mask. And the radial filters work just like they did before, but with some options that Photoshop did not previously have. All these new features are free.

Designing revolves around layers, and nowadays the layers are more than ever important in the process of creating an illustration. Photoshop, the software of Adobe, is a powerhouse in terms of providing a powerful design tool that organizes and reorganizes layers. The creative tool uses layer concepts like creating a selection mask, and therefore it serves as an essential part of Adobe Illustrator, another powerful program. A key purpose for using Photoshop is to make corrections to your image. The software allows you to select your parts of the image that you want to correct. Because of this, you'll need to create a separate layer that contains you corrections to one layer. The software also allows you to resize an image, and it is also used to convert color modes and to fix mistakes that you may see when projecting images. A color balance adjustment lets you quickly tweak the color of the artwork you've selected based on one of seven different visual elements. From color temperature – the way that colors appear in the light or the environment (warm, cool, etc.) – to brand color, which can be used to subtly guide the viewer's eye or tie colors in with a brand's design or branding. Flattening all the images in your working document or selection gives you black and white – perfect for printing. However, you can create a dramatic effect, even a night effect or black and white image, by adding a high level of contrast between the darkest and lightest areas. With Levels, you can sharpen the image and adjust the contrast even more. Use the settings based on the working image or try the different options to learn what works best for you in your finished product. 933d7f57e6

Here are some helpful tips for gaining inspiration and taking a series of low-key photographs of your home:

- Spend the night at your home. The best low-light photographs are taken with the lights off. Plus, it's fun.
- Take a few photographs as the sun goes down for a beautiful, creative sunset. Sometimes, the best low-light photographs happen when you find that one perfect location. Rely on your intuition to prompt you.
- Take advantage of the best light conditions that you find in your home. If your home is in a high-rise, the sun will often enter the building through the skylights. This generally creates a beautiful sky that lends a deep blue tone to a photograph.
